

The longer big companies fight independent/municipal ISP projects, the worse it will be for competition. Money spent by big business on attorney fees would be better spent on actual deployment of services. Companies like BellSouth would rather do this, just to control the market they're in, and I'd rather not have a monopoly to contend with in this situation. Thank you for your attention.